papers in its elections.

He pointed out that the EVMs since they were first adopted in the United States by many states 15 years ago were found to be vulnerable to hacking as the computer scientists found every make and model susceptible to malfunctioning for many reasons.

They found that the systems were not designed with robust security in mind and even where the security features were included, experts found them to be poorly implemented with glaring holes.

Adultery law arbitrary, violative...

"Look at the next part, if a married man has sexual intercourse with other married woman with the consent or connivance of her husband then also no offence is made out," it said. Terming the provision as not being "gender neutral", it referred to the classical test of "manifest arbitrariness" and "discrimination" under Article 14 (right to equality) to examine the validity of a law.

"On arbitrariness test, the fact that husband's connivance will not make it a crime is manifestly arbitrary," the bench said, adding that going by the classical test of Article 14, there was "no intelligible differentia for achieving the object which is protecting sanctity of marriage". It then referred to offence of bigamy under Section 494 of the IPC and said that it is gender neutral as it punishes both husband and wife and said that section 497 only provides for punishment to the husband only.

"The distinction between section 494 (bigamy) and section 497 (adultery) itself makes section 497 unconstitutional," the bench said. Advocate Kaleeswaram Raj, appearing for petitioner Joseph Shine, an Indian living in Italy, referred to various facets of Section 497 and said it treats married men and women differently with regard to their prosecution for adultery. The lawyer said he was not challenging adultery as a ground for seeking divorce by estranged couple. He said though the provision provided for prosecution of men only and but he was not seeking to make it gender neutral as it was "inherently flawed".

"(Lord) Macaulay (author of IPC) himself did not want to include this provision in the IPC," the bench said. Section 497 was "indirectly discriminatory" towards women under Articles 14, 15 (prohibition of discrimination) and it gave an impression that it was protective of women but it was not and rather conceived them as chattel incapable of decision making, he said, adding that it was a kind of "patriarchal" protection.
